For example I am working with two jvm's (so this question could apply to.NET in theory). If I include a jar in the projects build path on one jvm and then build on the other jvm the jar will almost always have a different version on the other jvm. I am not sure how reliable this is as a solution to this but I'm not sure why this is a problem. I run the jars on different projects via BuildPath and the other project is the obvious project that depends on the jar I get. If I have a problem with the class, it's easy to replace the jar. So I'm wondering if there is a solution that doesn't involve needing to have full trust on the jar file so the build will not fail because the jar file changes between build environments and projects. The options I thought were: Manually copy the jar to the target on each environment. Use %USERPROFILE%\AppData\Local\Temp\TEMP% so the temp version is in the place I expect I was thinking there was a solution in using a config or an environment variable so every class or project knows its location. I do not want to deal with these issues myself. I want someone else to build, test and release this code. If there is no solution outside of "just manually copy the jar to the other jvm or make sure the other developer installs the same version of the jar file" that would be OK. A: Short answer: Trust the jar file. Otherwise, you'll have the following issues: It will happen every time you build. You don't have visibility into the jar files, so you won't know b7e8fdf5c8
